Young women who have been trafficked for sexual exploitation have unique perceptions about their lives and the significance of having been trafficked. Drawing on rich narratives of the domestic trafficking experience through stories collected in the course of focus groups and in-depth interviews in Cebu Philippines, this event will challenge participants to understand trafficking from a Life Course Perspective. An analysis of the women's stories through a Life Course perspective builds on and provides an innovative and new context for trafficking prevention and responding to women who have been trafficked. This is significant for those seeking to address sex trafficking, in particular, social workers, service providers, policy makers, program developers and trafficked women themselves.
